

Making a Seat Harness Sexy¹ Again

The seat harness has been the butt of a lot of cruel jokes over the past decade. Once the accepted standard, lately it's more commonly referred to as a diaper. And you know why – there are people waddling around the launch in seat harnesses big enough to double as a grocery bag.² What many may not know is that, for years, Dakine has been custom-making lightweight, slim seat harnesses with a super-low hook for professional racers – and now the company is making its new Race Series seat harness available to you, with a Power Clip buckle system, adjustable spreader bar height and 8-point load-dispersion system. It's built for speed, and boy, does it look fast.³ Do we want one? Ab. So. Lutely.

¹ Go ahead. Whine. Complain. Tell us how "sexy" doesn't belong in a windsurfing magazine. We don't care, because you know what? We think windsurfing is sexy. And come on. That seat harness is covering more of her butt than most bikini bottoms.

² Lest you think that we're making fun of people who wear seat harnesses, let it be known that the editor of this very magazine owns (and uses) a seat harness. It's pink. Well, it was red. But now it's pink.

³ Yes, she does windsurf. No, we don't know if she's fast. No, you may not have her number. Yes, we eagerly anticipate the return of the chest harness. (We kid, we kid.)

PHOTO: AMARETT JANS